

Mount Nittany

Mount Nittany is the most prominent natural landmark of the Centre Region and Penn State, gently rising above Happy Valley. Mount Nittany's unforgettable slope rises against the sky as both a welcoming beacon and silent sentinel for Penn Staters, townspeople, and visitors alike. Nit-A-Nee, an American Indian word meaning "single mountain" or "windbreak," became the namesake of Penn State and is today familiar to Americans everywhere.

The Mountain is a symbol of our pride and a place of activity and daily pilgrimage. A classic hike for Central Pennsylvanians, Mount Nittany offers more than 8 miles of Blue and White Trails across more than 800 pristine acres and many scenic views, including the popular Mike Lynch Overlook.

The ascent is a healthy challenge, the trails are beautiful, and the Mountain's trees, flowers, and ground cover are inspiring. A secret valley on top of Mount Nittany is also a nature preserve. Deer, turtles, and creatures of all kinds make this a special and quiet wilderness. As you make your pilgrimage to Mount Nittany, consider all those in whose footsteps you follow. But please, leave no trace.

MOUNT NITTANY: A PUBLIC GOOD, PRIVATELY OWNED

Penn Staters and Pennsylvanians of goodwill have worked together for generations to conserve Mount Nittany, protecting it from development and maintaining it in its natural state for the benefit of the public. In 1945, Lion's Paw Alumni Association saved 525 acres from the threat of lumbering. Over time, threats grew. In 1981, the Mount Nittany Conservancy was formed to acquire, conserve, and maintain all possible acreage in its natural state. Today, we conserve more than 800 acres and actively protect the Mountain from human and environmental threats through the support of friends like you.

HIKING BY THE SEASON

A hike through the Mount Nittany forest is rewarding in any season. Trails lead up to seven major scenic overlooks, most popularly the Mike Lynch Overlook and its views of Penn State and State College. To conserve the Mountain, please avoid departing from the Blue and White Trails and leave no trace. Scan the code below to learn more.

At the start of the climb, rich soils and gentle slopes support a diverse assortment of trees, including oaks, white ash, sugar and red maples, shagbark hickories, basswoods, and several others. As you climb, chestnut oaks are the major tree, with a scattering of red and black oaks, pignut hickories, and white, pitch and table mountain pines.

Near the top, numerous American chestnuts continue to sprout from old roots, and dense growths of black birch and some paper birch and sassafras are found. Thickets of the fast-growing-but-scrubby striped maple or moosewood and bracken fern are troublesome along some of the trails. The forest floor is covered everywhere with low-bush blueberries and shrubs.

In spring, Mother's Day is an ideal time to hike. Spicy fragrant pink azaleas have burst forth on the upper areas, with occasional pink lady slipper orchids appearing underneath. Pink trailing arbutus line some trails. Mountain laurels peak a month later. Serviceberries bloom ahead of them, their white flowers presaging red/purple fruits in June. May also sees the return of Migratory birds.

In summer, yellow false foxgloves and loosestrifes are common along some trails. On the Boalsburg/Penns Valley side, blackberries and black raspberries flourish. Wintergreen or teaberry, with its small red berries, is almost everywhere. In some damper areas, mushrooms and saprophytic white Indian pipes and red and yellow pine saps sprout.

In the fall, birches, ashes, hickories, and some maples turn yellow. Oaks follow from bronze to dark red. A sampling of wildflowers are held in check by dense forest cover. In low damp areas, witch hazel bushes yield yellow, stringy flowers.

In winter, leafless trees along ridge trails offer additional valley views. Snow shows deer, fox, turkey, and bear tracks. Pileated and downy woodpeckers abound.

Mission

We conserve Mount Nittany as a natural treasure for all generations.
